Due meaning in tagalog

In the context of Philippine culture, the Tagalog word "kilig" refers to the feeling of excitement due to various love circumstances such as making first eye contact with one's crush or watching another person propose to someone.[1] The term kilig can also refer to having a butterfly in your stomach, and the feeling of being flushed that only a certain person can make you feel.It is a romantic excitement. [2] There is no exact equivalent English term for kilig.[3] Definition There is no clear definition of the concept or a definite translation into English. Some of the not so accurate translations include "giddiness," "shudder," "tremble," "tingle" and "thrill." The word is much closer to the idiomatic expression "tickle pink." According to Ateneo de Manila University Sociology Anthropology Department faculty member Skilty Labastilla, kilig is usually felt in the first phase of romance, particularly during courtship or honeymoon phase in a relationship.[4] In scientific terms, according to neuropsychologist Dr. Danilo Tuazon, hormones play a role when someone feels kilig.[5] Those hormones that stimulate emotions include testosterone produced by the Leydig cells, adrenaline and norepinephrine, both produced by the adrenal medulla. Testosterone is for motivation while adrenaline is for the increase on one's heart rate and norepinephrine is for the regulation of emotions. Sociologist Bro. Clifford Sorita, defines kilig as an initial attraction; either having a crush or infatuating over someone. Sorita insists that on this phase, it can't be defined that if one feels kilig over someone, the person already has a deep relationship with that certain someone and asserts that kilig is not yet love. However, the sociologist also added that kilig may lead to love if it becomes an avenue for more meaningful interaction with the person.[5] Filipino journalist Bernadette Sembrano states in her column in The Philippine Star that aside from infatuated love, kilig can also refer to intense passion or interest that leads a person to jump for joy or shout with high-pitched voice.[6] One can also feel kilig while watching another pair in a romantic relationship in film or television shows.[5] The word "kilig" was added to the Oxford English Dictionary in March 2016. As a noun, it is defined as "shudder" or a "thrill", while as an adjective it is defined as "exhilarated by an exciting or romantic experience".[7] See also Look up kilig in Wiktionary, the free dictionary. In fact, alongside Tagalog, it is the official language of the country. It has, however, its own variant of English, containing several English words and phrases that are used and understood differently than in other English-speaking countries. Read on to avoid getting lost in translation should you encounter any of these terms when travelling to the Philippines.This is very frequently used by Filipinos, and is said out of courtesy before leaving. It is actually a literal translation of the Tagalog Mauna na ako, which is a polite way of asking permission to leave before the other person during a get together. Travellers to the country encounter this phrase a lot and are oftentimes confused, but really all it means is, "I'll be going now, see you!"Filipinas leaving and waving goodbye | © Brian Evans / FlickrDon't be confused upon seeing signs or doors labelled "C.R.". This is an acronym for "comfort room", so this simply means restroom or washroom.Don't make the mistake of calling the female host of the Filipino party you attended a "hostess", because this word takes on a whole new meaning in the Philippines: it is widely used as a euphemism for a prostitute. The acronym G.R.O., meaning Guest Relations Officer, is another term meaning the same.By definition, the word tomboy simply refers to girls who enjoy things and activities usually associated with boys. But in the Philippines, tomboy is usually used to refer to lesbians.No, this does not refer to the make of car. Instead, it refers to a very common form of local public transport that was originally made from U.S. military Jeeps left behind after WWII. They're long and brightly-colored, and have become a cultural icon. Often referred to as the "King of the Road", the Philippine jeep is the local version of a jitney.Philippine Jeepney | © Davocano / FlickrAgain, this isn't the cute little vehicle you used to pedal around your neighborhood as a child. A tricycle in the Philippines is another form of public transport made by attaching a motorcycle to a sidecar. It can fit anywhere from two to five passengers, depending on size and design.Tricycle Ride | © John Christian Fjellestad / FlickrThis phrase is often used in the country's service industry, and it means the exact opposite in the Philippines as it would in any other country. Don't blow your top or get impatient when told to wait "for a while", because instead of meaning you'll be waiting for a long time, it means the person will get back to you in just a short while.Often joked about in the country, the term mamser is an amalgam of the words ma'am and sir, and is used in the service industry as a default way of greeting customers. So when you walk up to the counter of your local Jollibee, don't be too surprised if you're greeted with a, "Good morning, mamser! Welcome to Jollibee!" English-speaking foreigners will likely encounter this while conversing with Filipinos who are less adept with the English language. This is a term used in self-deprecating humor, and means the Filipino can't keep up with the other person's English, or has difficulty understanding his accent. It implies that the the Filipino has used up all his English vocabulary and is thinking so much, his nose might just begin to bleed—metaphorically, of course. Some foreigners could find this annoying and take it as rudeness (since a Filipino might just cut you off mid-sentence and say "wait, nosebleed"), but it's really just a funny, self-mocking way of saying "I don't understand". So laugh along with them and just repeat yourself, preferably with simpler words.Confused | © Brian Evans / FlickrAnother word that means the complete opposite when used in the Philippines is salvage. While it really means "to save" something, here, it means "to kill" someone, usually extrajudicially. This term was used widely during the Marcos dictatorship, when he ordered the deaths of a long list of people, without legal proof, cause, or trial. The term is believed to stem from the Tagalog word salbahe (derived from the Spanish salvaje), which means brutal or savage.Instead of the acronym A/C, the Philippines uses the abbreviation aircon to refer to air conditioning.Instead of "fridge", Filipinos use the abbreviation ref to mean refrigerator.If somebody asks you, "Is it traffic today?" instead of, "How's the traffic today?", don't be so confused. Traffic is often used as an adjective in the Philippines, instead of the noun that it is. Traffic is often used to mean "heavy traffic", so if a Filipino tells you, "Wow, it's so traffic on EDSA today," you'd be best taking a different route.Manila Traffic | © John Martinez Pavliga / FlickrCompletely grammatically incorrect, some Filipinos make the mistake of using the words "open" and "close" to mean "switch on" and "switch off". So when a Filipino tells you to "open the lights" and "close the aircon", don't begin taking home appliances apart.Aside from the piece of cloth used to wipe your mouth at the dinner table, napkin can also refer to sanitary pads for that time of the month.When a Filipino says he's getting "high blood" amidst a stressful situation, don't immediately rush him to the hospital. He's probably not referring to his blood pressure. Instead, he's likely trying to tell you he's getting really angry and flustered.Woman clenching sand in her fist | © Denise Bentulan / FlickrWe and our partners use cookies to better understand your needs, improve performance and provide you with personalised content and advertisements.
