Often this is caused by not enough air flow through the machine. Check and make sure your exhaust vent is not clogged. Clean it the best you can to get all the lint, dead mice, bird nests, etc. out. Also make sure air is blowing out of the machine when it is turned on. If not you have a blower problem. The thermal fuses are located on the element casing. With a multimeter, check the continuity across the terminals.

If there is no continuity the fuse needs to be replaced. To check the elements, you can either visually look and see if it is broken or check the continuity with a multimeter. No continuity means the element is broken. Replace if necessary. Seems to be a problem with the speed sensor which I assume was on the control board and replacing the board fixed the problem. My question, is it possible to figure out what component on the board went bad and replace that resistor or cap or replay or whatever. The issue was just with spinning and seems to be because the control panel no longer knew what was going on with the speed of the motor, therefore it would not turn it when it needed to spin. Turning the motor to wash, or draining the washer was not the issue. Just the spinning. So it may just be a single component on the board that needs replacing.
