Parts came quickly, and fit right on, I only used a couple of o rings and the top cylinder seal. Worked fantastic after installing. Installing was easy, and took about 10 minutes. Nice product. When you order the fasteners, however, you find two types of 15gauge nails. One says "FN" on the product, and the other "DA." What's the difference Both are made with 15gauge wire and feature a chisel point, ideal for finishing applications. Yet they have a different collation angle and head shape from one another.

While the differences may seem slight, they're enough to halt your finish nailer—and whatever job you're working on. It was created by Senco Brands, and not surprisingly, their 15gauge finish nailers are all designed to use this style of nail. In fact, it's also compatible with many other brands, including Metabo HPT, Dewalt, and MAX. But Bostitch has a different take on the matter. The label "FN" simply stands for "finish nail," the company explains. Taking a different angle so to speak, Bostitch says the main difference between an FN and DA nail is in the nails collation angles. FN finish nails have an angle of around 25 degrees," says a rep from the company. It's worth noting that Bostitch carries both DA and FN style nails. So, which type of 15gauge finish nail and its respective nailer should you choose Interestingly enough, fans of FN nailers find the exact opposite to be true. Truth be told, in the age of Internet, availability is no longer a concern on either account. The angle of nail and nail gun you choose is really up to your finish and trim needs. A steeper magazine angle is better for accessing tight corners. If that's what you're looking for, the 34degree DA nail and nailer is ideal. On the other hand, if you want fewer reloads, you'll want to consider the 25degree FN style. I didn't see it in your article but the battery powered Milwaukee gun will also shoot a DA Style finish nail. It's kind of useless info but thought it may help. Thanks again. I plan to use construction adhesive as well. We've had a lot of success with SureFit 16 Gauge Finish Nails. Cincinnati, OH 45240 Cincinnati, OH 45240.
