Basic elements of a medical certificate A medical certificate format will vary depending on the country, the type of physician and the purpose of the certificate. It is essential to understand the medical certificate follows certain legal and medical standards. An ordinary medical certificate must contain the following sections. Certificate's title. Ordinarily, at the top of the document, it'll be labeled as a medical certificate. Patients information. The medical certificate will have blanks to fill in the patients details such as the patient's name, sex, age, address, and telephone number. Physicians details. Besides the patient's details, the medical certificate will have a section with the physician's details. They include the name of the doctor, clinic or hospital name, professional license or registration number, etc. Physicians notes. I this section the doctor will fill in essential details about the patient's health status.Dates/validity period. This section will bear the date of issue or for how long the certificate will be valid.Authentication. The medical certificate must contain a valid signature from the doctor. Is it illegal to take a medical certificate? Many employees are tempted to take a medical certificate every time they want to take a few days off without authorization from their employers. It's against the law to take a medical certificate. Do you know you can land a serious problem with the law if your employer or college notices you've presented a fake doctor's note? Though students might face fewer stiff consequences than employees by faking a medical note, they may not escape penalties altogether. Penalties that a student might face include suspension from school, letter to their parent or guardian or expulsion from school or college. Employees might face a stiff penalty if they're discovered to have issued a fake doctor's note. The severity of the punishment will vary from one organization to another. One can lose their job; they can be sacked or face a jail term. If you have to take a fake doctor's note to your employer, you must be careful to avoid dire consequences.
