Car games computer download

All cars manufactured today contain at least one computer. It is in charge of monitoring engine emissions and adjusting the engine to keep emissions as low as possible. The computer receives information from a many different sensors, including: The oxygen sensor the air pressure sensor the air temperature sensor the engine temperature sensorThe throttle position sensorThe knock sensorThe oxygen sensorUsing the information from these sensors, the computer can control things like the fuel injectors, spark plugs and the idle speed to get the best performance possible from the engine while keeping emissions low. The computer can also sense when something has gone wrong and can inform the driver with the "Check Engine" light. A mechanic can read a diagnostic code from the computer and fix the problem. Depending on how expensive the car is, there can be all sorts of other computers. For example: There is probably a computer controlling the automatic transmissionIf the car has anti-lock brakes, there is a computer reading the wheel speed and controlling the brakesMany air bag systems have their own computersA car with keyless entry or a security system has a computer for these systemsAdvanced climate control systems often have computersSome cars now have motorized seats and mirrors that can remember the settings for multiple drivers, and these contains a computer of its ownCruise control systems use computersIn other words, a modern luxury car is a rolling computer network. It is amazing how many embedded controllers a car can have. So what was the deal about whether our cars would start on January 1, 2000? Nothing. The computers in our cars have no idea what today's date is because it is irrelevant to their calculations. If you take the battery out of your car to replace it, all of the computers lose power. Your radio, for example, may forget its preset stations. However, you don't have to reset the date on any of these embedded computers because none of them care. Here are some interesting links: Detailansicht Hybrid Motor image by 3rdTwin from Fotolia.com It's easy to think of a car as a mechanical system with moving parts and technology from a century ago. However, modern cars make extensive use of computers, setting them apart from the older models from which they evolved. Computers make cars safer, more powerful and more efficient, with promises of even more benefits in the future. Some of the most important onboard computers in any car are those involved in vehicle safety. Anti-lock brake systems (ABS) and electronic stability control both rely on sensors in the wheels that indicate a lack of traction. These computers then either engage a motor to pulse the brakes (ABS) or transfer power to wheels that still have traction (stability control). Air bag control units sense an impact or sudden stop, deploying the airbags in a fraction of a second. Alarms and vehicle immobilizers also use computers to disable the ignition. Modern cars continue to reach new performance thresholds, largely with the help of computers. Almost all passenger cars today use electronic fuel injection, which is a computer-controlled alternative to carburetors that blends air and fuel in precise amounts for ignition in the engine that provides enough power without being wasteful or producing too many harmful emissions. Another common performance computer is the automatic transmission, which shifts up and down based on speed, driver input and available engine power. Hybrid-electric vehicles also rely heavily on computers to set the blend of electric and gas power to ensure that the car always gets adequate power in the most efficient way. Computers also manage a hybrid's batteries and regenerative braking system. A car may include dozens of small computers to control all of the various convenience features that drivers have become so accustomed to. Power automatic windows and door locks all use computers, as do self-dimming headlights and automatic windshield wipers. Climate control systems use a central computer to receive temperature and flow of air to keep the occupants comfortable. Car entertainment systems are also computer-based, combining CD and DVD players with GPS navigation, hands-free cell phone links, and displays for trip data such as fuel economy and range. Finally, the modern automobile includes a computer called the engine control unit, which not only manages the engine during driving but also records any problems or irregularities in overall vehicle performance. One of the first things many auto technicians do is attach a scanner to the vehicle's ECU to access recent error codes and get an idea of what might be causing the problem. ECUs measure emissions, engine compression and electrical operations throughout the car. Updated: 06/30/2020 by Computer Hope Was this page useful? Computer Games Online, the Web counterpart to the print magazine, is one of those game-review sites that doesn't dawdle over detail. Its brief (oneor two-page) reviews make their point, highlight a few screen shots, and they're done. It's a good way for you to keep up with new releases too. A Features section includes interviews and editorials, and a smallish Cheats section hosts game codes. Instructables is a community for people who like to make things.
